Cannabis is a robust, vigorous and rapidly growing plant that responds very well to crop optimization techniques such as: pruning; propagation through cuttings; hydroponic cultivation and more. In a previous article we looked at the so -called "destructive" techniques such as pruning, supercrocopping, etc. And in this article we are going to talk about a very useful technique for both indoor and outdoor farmers: training or ligament, e e itengiv inoizareneg rep evod ,olocirga erottes len enigiro otuva ah acincet atseuQ .)enoisserp assab a enoizamrof(TSL emoc sibannac id irotavitloc iad otacidni was cultivated using a variety of training techniques, to facilitate harvesting and improve crop productivity. Plant training is a traditional technique in vineyards and orchards Why train cannabis plants? The most common use of training is to limit the height of our cannabis plants, either to make sure they stay at a discreet height and out of sight under a wall or fence when we are growing outdoors or to maintain the tops of plants at the correct distance from our lamps for internal cultivation, we can bend them and to manipulate their structure, without needing to grasp their or cut the tip in growth. Training works to keep our plants out of sight, it is a technique that favors the development of secondary branches and maximizes exposure to light to the lower parts of cannabis plants, which will encourage the formation of buds throughout the plant, rather than a huge central central Coca Cola. This is a definite advantage in situations with high humidity during the flowering period, since the growth of a huge bud makes plants much more inclined to mould or bud than if we develop a greater quantity of smaller flowers, distributed evenly on the plant. Another advantage of uniform coverage is that all buds will be ready at the same time, contrary to untrained plants where the higher flowers mature before lowering. This allows growers to work more efficiently at harvest time, reducing the whole plant, instead of having to remove the tops, then return later to the lower buds. What happens when we train cannabis plants? Thanks to a phenomenon known as phototropism - when the growth of plants responds to the stimulus of light - the parts ofWhich are now shaded will begin to produce more growth hormones, called auxine, which increase the stretching of the cells on the shady side of the plant, with the plant, with the plant, with the plant, with the plant, with the Effect of directing the peak, or of growing again towards the light, while the lower branches now be able to take advantage ofÃ Âmore energy and light. Once the secondary branches are well formed thanks to improved light exposure, we can begin to bend them as well, directing energy to the tertiary branches, or we can decide to begin flowering at this point, depending on the available surface area and the number of plants being cultivated. Auxin distribution controls phototropism. 1. Sunlight strikes the plant from directly above. Auxin (pink dots) encourages growth straight up. 2, 3, 4. Sunlight strikes the plant at an angle. Auxin is concentrated on one side, encouraging growth at an angle from the preceding stem. (Credit: MacKhayman) If this training is repeated as necessary throughout the growth stage, and continued into the stretch period (at the beginning of flowering), this method allows us to obtain a more homogenous and even canopy of flowering plants, similar to SCROG (Screen of Green) cultivation, filling the grow space to the maximum with perfectly illuminated flowers, rather than growing plants upright, where the lower buds won¢ÂÂÂt mature as well due to lack of light. It is also a method widely used by outdoor gardeners who want to grow discreetly on balconies or patios, where the height of the plantsÃ ÂmustÃ Âbe controlled to keep them out of view. LST in action. On the right we can appreciate how, 5 days after tying down the main stem, this autoflowering plant now has multiple flowering heads, all receiving equal sunlight. When to begin training? Most growers start to train their cannabis plants once they have betweenÃ Ã3 and 6 nodes, or pairs of leaves. At this young stage in the plants development its stem is pliable and easily bent over without any risk of breaking, but as the plantÃ ÂgetsÃ Âolder the stem thickens and grows stiffer, making training impossible. Of course, we can continue to train the secondary or tertiary branches as the plants grow, and a major advantage of LST over pruning is We can train the plant through flowering if we were to control the height, while the pruning in a phase so late of the cycle would close the plants, the slow development and the mature of the delay. How to train cannabis plants, the natural flexibility of cannabis branches makes it relatively easy to bend the stem and branches without stopping growth, as long as we remain attentive. Three car plants -fiorenti trained in the same container using a rope, we can anchor the upper part of the plant some nodes under the tip of growth, up to a fixed point nearby. In many cases, we can attach the rope to the edge of the pot or a stick or hook pushed into the ground. We start by slightly folding the stem and gradually increasing the voltage day after day, until we are satisfied with the location. Pay attention to the way the plant reacts, do not excessively touch the rope and recalls that the flexibility of the branches can vary from one plant to another. Use a highly visible string to avoid tangling! To obtain the best results from the use of this technique, we must follow some simple rules. Firstly, do not use a string that is too fine and that could act like a thread of cheese, cut or narrow the branch as the voltage is applied or as the branch grows. Soft plastic ties or any other flexible material and often can be used to stick to a branch, thus avoiding the plant. Using the dense and colorful cable in the house, he ensures that he is easily visible, helping us to avoid grabbing ourselves or our equipment while we work in the garden, an accident that otherwise could easily occur when we have something that resembles a spider made of a spiderA multitude of bonds, strings and media surrounding the Of course, in a situation of guerrilla cultivation we would like to do the exact opposite and use a neutral rope that will not catch the attention and possibly give our plants.
